Center for Cultural Innovation (CCI) Announces Recipients of the Investing in Tomorrow Organizational Grants Program
Change Capital for Shaping the Future of California’s Arts Nonprofit Field by Arts Organizations and its Visionaries

San Francisco & Los Angeles, CA – The Center for Cultural Innovation (CCI) today announced the fourteen Investing in Tomorrow Organizational grantees’ funded projects. The program is made possible with support from the William and Flora Hewlett Foundation.

Investing in Tomorrow Organizational Grants provides funding for projects by diverse and up-and-coming leaders at nonprofit or fiscally sponsored arts organizations that have the potential to re-shape the trajectory of California’s nonprofit arts sector in ways that advance intergenerational and multicultural leadership, inclusion and equity, and new sustainability models.

The 2017 Investing in Tomorrow Organizational Grants program granted $105,000 to fourteen projects taking place throughout California. Each grant of $7,500 supports catalytic individual and institutional leadership at this time of tremendous social, economic, generational, demographic, and technological change.

Out of 106 applicants, the fourteen grantees of the Investing in Tomorrow Organizational grants are:

Arts Council of Santa Cruz County (Santa Cruz), to launch The Creative Express, a mobile visual and performing arts studio designed by Creative Young Artists, a youth arts collective in Watsonville, CA. The converted bus, led by a diverse group of young leaders, will travel to... and serve the neighborhoods of those who have been historically overlooked by formal arts institutions.

Asian American Women Artists Association (San Francisco), to foster the professional development of emerging curators of color so as to diversify the curatorial profession and commensurately increase the visibility of exhibitions of Asian American women artists, through training, workshops, and seminar programs.

Bisemi Foundation (Oakland), to support the Cultural Arts Incubator Program, which is designed to proliferate and empower women of color in performing arts and arts administration, by producing a series of short films documenting participants’ experiences in tailored intensive retreats and workshops.

Del Sol Performing Arts Organization (San Francisco), to adopt an internationally tested arts cooperative, membership-based fundraising model to finance a new music series in an intimate setting of a private San Francisco home.

Gallo Center for the Arts (Modesto), to launch a Technical Theater Mentorship Program to address their growing need for skilled technical theater professionals in the San Joaquin Valley region. The program will provide opportunities for economically disadvantaged youth from local high schools to be trained for technical jobs in production, and offers an experiment in workforce development by a local presenting institution.

The Harmony Project (Los Angeles), to offer a mariachi music program to students in Leimert Park, Los Angeles, including the formation of an all-girls mariachi ensemble class, cultivating skills specific to the performance of mariachi such as Spanish language competency, musical proficiency, and showmanship. This project also brings together Mexican American and Leimert Park’s historically African American communities and cultures in a distinctly Southern Californian way.

Hartnell College Foundation (Salinas), to establish an Arts Hub at the College that focuses on arts entrepreneurship, connects artists to local businesses in the public and private sectors, and provides local artists with access to space, tools, and equipment. Hartnell College provides a model for how a local college can be a resource to local (non-enrolled) artists, and a connector between the arts community and other local industries.

Hope Mohr Dance (San Francisco), to support the creation of “Queer Crossings,” a Community Engagement Residency that will provide sanctuary and creative opportunity for queer, immigrant artists of color to create new works of performance inspired by the intersection of their experiences. These are perspectives not well represented in the arts or society, and this attention reflects the important role that a dance company can play in giving voice to marginalized people.

Justice For My Sister Collective (Los Angeles), to support “Nuevas Novelas,” a two-part job training program for 20 young women of color in Boyle Heights, Los Angeles, to improve their media literacy skills through filmmaking apprenticeships. This project is a training pipeline to be financed largely through paid contracts, and addresses both a new enterprise business model and the need to increase underrepresented voices in media.

Media Arts Santa Ana (Santa Ana), to launch the Millennial Producers Academy, a program that will provide digital media arts production training, entrepreneurial skills, and cultural agility development to a cohort of young adults selected from local community, social justice, health, cultural and advocacy organizations.

MiHistoria (San Landro), to support a new performance-based strand to the organization’s work in empowering Latinas to be the authors of their own stories. The project will bring together rural farmworker and urban immigrant women to meet and create texts, culminating in public performances in the Bay Area and Central Coasts.

RYSE Inc. (Richmond), to support “Rooted in Richmond,” which will empower young teaching artists to lead a dynamic community-based art project centered on place-based inclusion and belonging, and addressing issues of affordable housing through a series of workshops.

Xochitl-Julisa Bermejo (San Gabriel), to support “Women Who Submit - Submission Workshops and Parties,” which are six free public events in partnership with community spaces, focused on supporting women and non-binary writers to prepare their creative work for publication and professional advancement.

Women’s Audio Mission (WAM) (San Francisco), to address the critical need for multicultural and bilingual Spanish leadership in WAM’s recently opened Oakland location by expanding part-time instructor Victoria Farjado’s role to a full time leadership position, using her social justice experience to develop a more inclusive curriculum for the advancement of women and girls in music production.

The creation of the Investing in Tomorrow Organizational Grants Program was driven by the findings of Creativity Connects: Trends and Conditions Affecting US Artists, a national report published by CCI in 2016 that described how the nonprofit arts sector is changing in dramatic ways. Both Creativity Connects and CCI’s 2017 Future Arts Forward convening, a gathering of over 200 artists and arts professionals, affirmed that emerging generations of arts leaders want to work toward advancing equality, inclusion, equity, and financial sustainability across generations and industry sectors.

CCI’s President and CEO Angie Kim said, “We are excited to be supporting important projects that are both about making visible culturally specific voices and shaping the trajectory of the arts sector. We wanted to validate often overlooked communities and ideas, and this group of grantees reflects that the future of the arts is in terrific hands.”

This program was adjudicated by an unusually large number of panelists to reflect a multitude of perspectives, regions, backgrounds, and generations. The statewide panel was made possible with support from the Kenneth Rainin Foundation. Panelists included:

- Lilia Aguero, San Jose, School of Arts and Culture
- Amar Azucena Cid, Sacramento, Caltrans
- Kym Cochran, Santa Barbara, Fishbon
- Rudy Espinoza, Los Angeles, Leadership for Urban Renewal Network
- Jonathon Freeman, Redding, Native Roots Network
- Jeremy Liu, San Francisco, Oakland, PolicyLink
- Madin Lopez, Los Angeles, ProjectQ
- Nikiko Masumoto, Central Valley, Masumoto Family Farm
